After more than two years of separation he decided to sacrifice everything and seek her in America, to marry her if he could persuade her to consent. He gathered a small amount of money and started for Canada. He had told his father of his determine tion, and the old genticrum promitis stopped his allowance.

When the young man reached Toronto it was to find that his sweetheart was married. She had not made a brilliant match from a material or social standpoint, but she was supremely happy.

Capt. Roper-Curzon realized that he must forget in good earnest. He decided to settle in Canada, to become a farmer in the far Northwest.

He enrolled as a student in the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph. He learned how to rake and hoe and plow. He milked cows, fed bogs and performed the other work required on
